It is considered by some that most of the domestic garbage is not processed properly. According to them, the only way to counter this problem is introducing strict laws to make "recycling" mandatory for domestic waste.
In my opinion, I believe that treating household rubbish (garbage) is crucial and the government should take necessary steps to ensure domestic wastes are effectively and efficiently recycled. ↑↓

Major proportion
Majority of the waste produced in a country consists (come from) household and domestic scrap. Hence, it is crucial (critical/important) to recycle the waste at very initial level.
[However, governmental authorities have failed in clean treatment of the waste]. A huge lumps of garbage are common on roads of a residential area. Many localities have either choked or failed drainage system due to which untreated garbage is littered all over the place.

A possible solution to this problem is making strict laws to enforce proper processing of household garbage. As it is seen in the medical and health care sector, there is a proper infrastructure treating medical waste. The same system and rules should be enforced for the household garbage as well. In fact general awareness programs should be organised by the authorities to educate people about the advantage of recycling. Moreover, recycling stations should be opened in each locality where people can process all kinds of domestic scrap. Financial penalties and punishment and even judicial trials should be imposed on those who fails to recycle their garbage.

In conclusion, both awareness and laws are required for the proper treatment of the waste. This will eventually lead to cleanliness and will help our future generations to live a clean and prosperous life.
