Residing in nations having linguistic differences can negatively impact one's social and well as practical life. In a negative way. In my opinion, I believe that living in countries with different mother tongues can pose problems, but it depends on the country's tradition and culture, and how they treat foreigners who speak in different language.

Language is a huge barrier while migrating from one country to another. It has observed that people who find difficulties in speaking the regional language face discrimination and are bullied in foreign countries. For instance, African people have challenges in speaking English language, hence it is very difficult for them to adapt western culture where majority of the population communicate in English.

On the other hand, there are foreigners

unfriendly countries ~~and~~ ^{and} citizens of these nations warmly welcome tourists and migrants of different ~~countries~~ ^{nationalities} irrespective of their mother tongue. Many ^{known} European countries are well ^{known} for tourist destinations and attract travellers and working people to have a wonderful stay in their nation. Citizens of these nation are helpful and supportive to foreigners because of their enriched culture and traditions. Government authorities also play an indispensable role in maintaining harmony between the foreigners and the locals. They provide a variety of language translation services in order to keep foreigners mingled with their citizens and ensure people do not face any social or practical problems.

In conclusion, ~~adapting~~ ^{adapting} culture of a country with different mother tongue is difficult ^{and} ~~and~~ ^{and} can have ^{negative} consequences. But, if people live with harmony with each other irrespective of their linguistic differences, everyone will be able to live peacefully and happily in all parts of the world.
