

It is argued by few people that art is a compulsory discipline for pupils in school. While, others believe that it is not beneficial at all. In the forthcoming paragraph, this essay will discuss both the views and points in detail with relevant examples.

On the one hand, some people believe that extra academic subjects is significant for children in education institution. In other words, this can be considered a ^{new} way to relax their mind by participating in subjects like music, painting and theatre. For example, there are many students who study for longer duration and reach to the saturation level at some point. By involving them into such activities will balance them mentally and boost their concentration power to make them focus equally on every discipline. Not only this, students who are not good in STEM areas can explore opportunities in other domains like an acting, painting or music etc. Therefore, this is how they can foster new skills and perhaps gain expertise into it.

On the other hand, many people think that it is a total wastage of time as pursuing art won't help in shaping pupil's career and may divert them from studying major's/specialisations. To elaborate, this means that extra academic subjects cannot give that exposure, what science and technology subjects can, which ended them up doing lower paid jobs. Moreover, such extra academic activities have become a distraction for students which deviate ^{Serial} them from their regular studies. For instance, children who prefer to become a scientist or an engineer get attractive salary packages and abroad opportunities.

To conclude, many people prefer not to encourage ^{their} children to get [^]indulge into extra academic disciplines. However, in my opinion, time has changed and every domain is getting equal importance since all of them are filled with opportunities.
