All over the world, art is considered an integral and vital part of a country's culture. But, less people are seen to enjoy art and instead focus on other domains such as science and technology or even business. The main reason for this trend is lack of knowledge about art by the person and this can be avoided by educating and teaching art to the masses.

From the childhood onwards, teachers neglect arts in a student's education. The child grows up with an attitude that studying art is not a relevant career choice. By not having knowledge and being exposed to art the person grows up ignoring the prominence of art in society. They are unaware about the efforts that are required, and different perspectives that the art means. Hence they cannot truely appreciate it to the fullest. The technique talent of each artist and techniques of art go unnoticed by the public. Moreover, much importance is given to other domains in a child's education and they are grown with that notion in their minds. The high paying jobs and surplus employment opportunities are more in domains like science and technology and business.

In my opinion, in order for art to be fully appreciated it must be given a significant importance in schools. By teaching art and developing interest in students it will boost their creativity and also instill an artistic mindset in them. Once they grow up they will be able to enjoy the art works and the culture and heritage of the country will not be forgotten. On another note, government can promote art in society by showcasing different artifacts and paintings in public spaces for a reasonable price. This will help the artists to get their work appreciated and help them earn a living.

PAGE NO.
DATE:

To conclude, for people to truely appreciate art, they must learn and be introduced to art from their childhood and by providing this education the trend of more people appreciating art will increase substantially.