Art is considered an essential part of all cultures throughout the world. However, these days fewer and fewer people appreciate art and turn their focus to science, technology, and business.

Why do you think that is?

What could be done to encourage more people to take interest in the arts?...

Throughout the world, it is believed that art is a vital part of all cultures. However, a majority of people these days are paying more attention towards science, technology, and business, leaving only a fewer people who appreciate art. In my opinion, financial instability forces people to give up on art and find a well paying job. On the contrary, sectors associated with techology and business provide better wages and job opportunities, this leads to large workforce working in these domains.

Art is one of the best way of preserving a culture. Despite, its importance not many people are willing to pursue their careers in art. One major reason behind this is erratic nature of employment, which often leads to bankruptcy and constant mental strain. For instance, a well known sketch artist can be replaced by someone who is more well versed with current trends in the field. In other words, once an art form becomes obsolete, it does not matter many years have been spent mastering it, the artist will be out of job. On the other hand, the jobs which requires less creativity such as software engineers, supply chain managers etc. are flooding the market every year, resulting in enrecruitment of large chunk of population. in these jobs.

In order to motivate people towards choosing art as their full-time job, the government should provide more incentives, especially in the form of stable income. Take, for, example authorities should build more art Museums to preserve the cultural diversity, this will result in artists getting jobs such as curator, tour guide for art gallery, etc., hence securing a good standard of living while following their passions. Therefore, the more secure artists financially are, the better will be the chances of people pursuing their careers in the field of art.

To conclude, art plays a mammoth role in securing the rich history of a culture. To achieve this, artistic should be motivated enough to master the skills required, for that authorities should provides stable sources of income to them. Eventually, career in art will became as lucrative as careers in science, technology and business.
