The decreasing safety of citizens even after reducing crime rates has been the matter of concern not just for some developing as well as developed countries. There are various causes and possible measures to solve this problem.

The most critical cause of this problem is underreporting of small crimes by citizens which make them feel unsafe. For instance, crimes like eve-teasing and minor thefts are not reported to the local police but these types of crimes can have serious repercussions. In Addition to this, security workers of some countries are not very cooperative to lodge a complaint by it's citizens which can be further dreadful to people of a nation. Finally, the past criminal incidents happened with people can make them fearful even in their own cities or countries.

The most immediate solution to this problem can be tightening of internal security infrastructure by the state which will build a sense of confidence among people for being safe.

However, the longer term solutions can be building stricter laws even for the smallest of crimes and also counsel the citizens to eliminate the fear from their minds. Both of these measures can be fruitful to build a stronger nation for the future.

In Conclusion, increasing fear levels among citizens are attributed to underreporting of cases, weak security structure and already existing fear among people. This can be solved over time with better security infrastructure and stricter crime laws.
