

It is argued that pupils execute better in school when they are rewarded preferably than being penalized. I believe that rewarding students can motivate them to perform better and increase their self confidence.

Students who were appreciated for their achievements will undoubtedly excel in their studies and it motivated them to be more creative. For instance, many teachers use rewards in order to stimulate learning and to motivate good behaviour in students. Moreover, Teachers have responsibility to explore the hidden talents of pupils. For example, when a student performs a simple Math problems. If the instructor reinforces them to do a complex sums they can do it by themselves.

Furthermore, rewarding influences students in a much more positive way. Recognizing children's academic achievements by awarding them medals, certificates, and trophies make them feel confident and proud of themselves, which keeps them motivated to perform well consistently.

This sense of happiness and fulfilment influence them to work hard without having their teachers or parents pushing them. For instance, many schools in my state achieve good results by stimulating their self confidence level of each pupil. On the other hand, those who think that corporal punishment improves students' grades may argue that the fear of getting punished would force them to feel depressed and shy. For instance, a student might want to spend his time playing with his peers rather than completing his homework, but if he knows that he would be punished if he did not complete the assignment, he feels more stressed and depressed. As a result of this depression, ~~many students~~ would support.

In conclusion, although rewards can better the performance of school students at most of the ~~the~~ situations all are benefited by it, and hence I believe
