#. Students perform better in school when they are rewarded rather than punished. To what extent do you agree or disagree?

→ Nowadays, it is believed that the students show a great interest in their studies when being rewarded as compared to getting penalized. I completely agree to this statement as rewarding a child from his early age can build motivate him for going to school and learn new things on daily basis. Recognising the students with prizes will always inspire them to stay in the competition in a positive way.

Pupils can always be encouraged to grasp more new things when they are recognized for their work. This can influence them to go to school daily and study hard resulting in remarkable results not only in academics but also in other co-curricular activities. For instance, my parents gifted me a bicycle when I scored 90% marks in my 10th grade. This motivated me a lot to study hard ~~in~~ for my 12th grade board exams as well. And as a result, I scored 86% marks and was rewarded with a smartphone.

In my opinion, every person has to compete with his fellow members to stay ahead of them in their work life. If students will be taught the right way of contesting in their early stage that could make a huge difference in later lives as well. To make this happen, one of the best ways is to remunerate the children for every small learnings. I would support my statement with an example. i.e. In most of the schools, top students are rewarded with scholarships for higher studies and that increases the zeal among children to study more and achieve good marks.

In conclusion, I ~~would~~ strongly believe that reward based education will always help to enhance a child's future rather than punishing him which could leave a negative impact on his whole life.
