

Task-2

* In most developed countries shopping is not only about buying the goods you need, it is also perceived as entertainment.

Is it a positive or negative development?

Give your own opinion and examples based on your experience.

Recently, most people tend to purchase something for their happiness and enjoyment. It has become one of the trends among the young generation. From my point of view, it is not a good idea that achieving something that we really do not need it. I will explain some reasons with an example that is based on my experience.

Obviously, purchasing something can relieve stress. However, it has more negative impact on individuals and society. Firstly, it can lead to environment issues. Since people started purchasing products which are not required and waste production has increased extremely. Because of citizens just take advantage of buying products for reduce their stress or to their own happiness and then they will throw it out into the trash due to these products are out of dated. According to market environmental research, the amount of waste production has gradually been ~~raising~~ raising per year.

Secondly, this trend let people evaluate other people's wealth. Mainly, a lot of people think that people who have high priced products as riches, people attempt to buy expensive things even though they can't afford it. For example, when I was in high school one of my friends had two part-time jobs in order to obtain a new bag which almost 1000$. It does not difficult anything if people who can manage their finances purchase something but for all that like high school students believe that owning high priced bags or clothes make them richer.

In conclusion, purchasing products that are not really necessary for people has a negative impact on personally and society.
