

According to some people the government is responsible for conserving the environment while others insist - that environmental protection is the duty of every individual. Let's analyse both points & you give my point of view to conclude it.

On the one hand ~~govt~~ authorities cannot control the actions of all individuals even with the laws to protect its human duty to cooperate with the regulatory bodies. As a human being we should reduce the amount of energy they use on a daily basis & start recycling plastic, follow zero garbage & other more materials. Every single need to be responsible while buying products so that they should not harm the living world. For example: instead of buying plastic bags we can replace it with cloth bags.

On the other hand government have nation responsibility to maintain ecosystem & can formulate constitution, regulation for industries & impose tighter controls on companies on discharging harmful chemicals & dispose of waste. By using executive power they can punish for illegal activities like cutting trees, throwing garbage, animal poaching etc. The administration has financial means to take national & environment problems.

To sum up everything that has been stated so far people can take small measures to secure their habitat from global warming, deforestation, natural calamities but the government has even bigger role in protecting the environment as it is a huge task.
