

Some people argue that there should be hunger for winning between teenagers while others think that they should be given moral values to help each other. This essay will discuss why adolescents should be motivated to have competition among themselves.

To begin with, there is general line saying competition makes a man perfect. When there is race among teenagers for winning, they give their hundred percent in that task. For example, when a adolescent give their hundred percent in an activity, it helps in their overall growth that is mentally as well as physical growth. Secondly, due to the hunger for winning, the pupils in the schools are fully concentrated in their task which increases their concentration levels and also restrict them from indulging in bad activities. For instance, as youngsters are involving in appalling activities at a very fast pace rate, this concept of need for winning will stop them for taking part in bad activities.

On the other hand, from our childhood we are given moral values to help each other is a problem. When kids are taught to cooperate with their classmates, it helps them in their future career.

For instance, when persons have the values of helping each other in difficult times, they solve the trouble very easily, and very quickly and this ^{should be} taught to a children in their upbringing. Secondly, the habit of doing work in teamwork also help the infants from ^{not} getting mean, and only thinking of themselves. For instance, in day to day life when employees are selfish, and are not ready to help each other, this depicts their bad personality to their subordinates.

In conclusion, in this today's hard challenging world, it is very necessary to be competitive as it makes us stand out from the crowd, and the offspring in the school should be encouraged to be competitive.
